ENDER-SUE-BEE RUNS FROM TROUBLE: PART 2

We're continuing the story of Susan and her blue fur coat. If you missed the first part be sure to get up to speed in the last newsletter, available on our webiste. I always loved having these stories told out loud, so we hope that you'll find someone nearby to read this out loud to - it is even more dramatic that way! We hope you enjoy! - Sierra Ward

One January Thursday Cindy, Sally, Jean, Beth* and I were lazily making our way toward our scout meeting at the old Glover House. I was trudging up Main Street under the weight of my blue fur coat. It had been cold when I left for school that morning, but now it was more coat than I needed on that warm winter afternoon. Adding to our load, we lugged our math books for homework that awaited our attention after the meeting.

When high school let out at 3:30 most of the students would walk down the hill from the west side of town to their homes and jobs in the center of town. About halfway up Main Street we would meet this hoard of giants and we tried not to get squashed. Most of the time they were oblivious to us, but occasionally we would encounter a surly knot of older boys who took delight in blocking us.

As we approached City Hall, just three blocks from the Darlings' house, we saw a pack of girls running down the street towards us. They were shouting to each other, and creating a commotion.

Cindy looked up and said, "That's Marianne Geurre and her gang. Don't even look at them or they'll pound you!"

"That's silly," Sally said, "Why would they pound us just for looking at them?"

Cindy probably spoke from experience. She lived down on Gwinn Avenue, not far from Marianne's house, and she was just the kind of girl that a bully would pick on. She had worn thick glasses since she was three years old and whenever she sensed anyone looking at her eyes she would glance away at the ground to avoid eye contact. Her intimidated posture cried out, "Pick on me!"

"You better not say anything to them or they'll pound you. I know!" Cindy argued, almost proudly.

"Nobody is going to pound you for looking at them. Besides, I'm not afraid," I said.

"You ought to be! Marianne Geurre is the toughest girl in high school!" Cindy said.

"She may be, but why would she pick on a bunch of little kids like us?" Beth asked. Sally, and I agreed with her. Cindy was being ridiculous.

"I heard that Geurre is french for war. That seems like the perfect name for her," Jean added.

"I dare you to call her a name when she goes by!" Cindy challenged us.

I don't know why it didn't occur to us that talking to and/or looking at, are not the same thing as calling names. We didn't have time to think about what we were doing as the older girls continued their mad dash in our direction. For whatever reason,

Sally decided to take up the challenge. Shortage of time must also have been a factor in impairing her judgment, because the first thing out of her mouth as they raced by was, "Fat-SO!" A completely inappropriate statement. Marianne Geurre was so skinny that she almost looked malnourished.

The group of them were running so fast that they were just past us by the time Sally called out her jeer. They were crossing Alert Street when they heard Sally, but like a cartoon, Marianne seemed to skid to a halt and turn around.

I had never been pounded. I didn't really know how it was done. When Cindy had first said the word I thought it sounded like an old-fashioned expression. I imagined someone being smashed with an oversized toy sledgehammer and driven into the ground like a pile driver. Whatever pounding was, I never wanted to find out.

It seemed like there were forty of fifty girls leering at us behind Marianne. They were only seventh graders - just two years older than us - but being in Junior High made them seem like adults.

"What did you say?" Marianne called up the hill to us.

I wanted immediately to retrieve the horrible word, and here she was, giving us a chance. I wanted to call, "Nothing Marianne! We didn't say anything!" or "She was just saying NOT SO! NOT SO bad a day for January!" But who could think under such pressure? One person for sure that couldn't think under pressure was Sally. Instead of leaving well enough alone she promptly repeated it, "FAT-SO!" she screamed back daringly.

What an idiot!
The last thing I remember, before I took off, was seeing Marianne and a couple of her toughest looking companions handing their school books to nearby subordinate minions, then they were off in our direction, like streaks of lightning. To our advantage they now had to run uphill. But to our disadvantage, so did we!

Cindy froze and simply awaited the inevitable. Sally tried to run, but Sally walked like an old lady, so running was impossible for her. Beth stood her ground. Jean, always a fast thinker and the smallest of the group, therefore the one most likely to need to rely on brains and not physical prowess, ran into City Hall, which was also the police station - now that was thinking!

I was not particularly athletic as a fifth grader, always on the short and scrawny end, I was never picked first for games in gym. But now I couldn't believe how fast I was going. I was darting in and out of groups of high school students as they trickled down the hill.

Some boy, noting my speed and agility called out, "Wow look at her go, get out of her way!"

I was afraid to look back for fear I'd lose some ground, but when I finally did, I saw one of the girls from Geurre's gang grab Cindy's arm and twist it behind her back until she crumpled to her knees. I saw Sally wrenched to a stop as another girl grabbed her by the hair, her math book tumbling out of her arms. And I could see Marianne Geurre out pacing them all, hot on my trail. All this I saw in what seemed like the blink of an eye. I couldn't look back again, I could not stop, I had to keep going no matter how tired I was. I had to get to Darlings' house!

My chest was pounding. My throat burned from heavy breathing, but I couldn't slow down. I had run almost a block when a group of boys compassionately parted to let me through. They seemed to sense my desperation.

I was wishing I hadn't worn my snow boots, they were so hard to run in. I had no sooner thought this than I slipped on a patch of ice. I was going to fall. It seemed like I was watching everything that was going to happen in slow motion, I would lose my books, skin my knees and then out of nowhere someone grabbed me and stopped my fall. His face was right up to mine.

Who was this I wondered? But I didn't have time to even look at him.

"GET OUTTA MY WAY!!! I'M GONNA KILL THAT BRAT!" Screamed Marianne from somewhere behind us. I didn't know if she was saying that to me or the boy who was helping me. I knew she was going to try and get me, but he looked big enough to take care of himself. I kept running.

Seconds later I heard her call. "WHO TRIPPED ME?! DANNY, YOU RACKIN FRACKIN FRACKIN RACKER!!! I'M GOING TO GET YOU!"

I had covered almost another block. I was at the corner of the Armory when I heard another boy call after her "Marianne Geurre, why don't you pick on someone your own size?"

If possible I was running even faster. I didn't even stop to look for traffic and I heard a horn blare as I darted across South Main. If Marianne was still trying to catch me she would have to stop for the car that had honked at me, and I would be at the big red brick house and through the door before she could cross the street.

I burst into Mrs. Darlings' foyer, not even stopping to knock as I usually did. I collapsed in a heap inside the door. I had never been so out of breath. I was gasping wildly as Mrs. Darling came into the room.

"Susan! You're early. You must have run all the way." She looked at the grandfather clock in the foyer, it was only 3:45. We were never there before 4:00. Then on closer inspection she asked, "Are you running from someone?"

I couldn't answer for lack of breath, but shook my head.

"Well, go get a glass of water while you catch your breath and wait for the others to get here. I have a few things to do before the meeting." She said.

I wanted a glass of water, but now I was trembling so bad I couldn't move. I was amazed at how long it was taking to regain my normal breathing, and how much it hurt, and how fast I had been able to run and for how far! I didn't know I had it in me! I was just beginning to feel safe when I had a terrible thought. What if Marianne was waiting around outside for me? No, she wouldn't do that. She might even think this is my home. After all I had run in without even knocking.

"Boy are you going to get it!" Becky, Sally, Beth and Jean chorused when they came in the door a few minutes later.

"Sara Kinsman almost broke my arm off because of you!" Cindy bemoaned.

"Because of me? It was your idea!" I retorted.

"I had a whole patch of my hair pulled out!" Sally added.

"You better watch out because Geurre said she was going to get you tomorrow!" Cindy gloated.
"Yeah and she's never gonna forget that coat." Sally said, "She even said so."

Beth added in a commiserating tone, "You're a goner."

What would I do? I don't remember a thing about the meeting that night, but I do remember that when it was over I was terrified to go home. What if she had waited for me? Did she think I lived here, or did the others tell her we were just going to a scout meeting? Beth lived the furthest from the center of town (out by Mack's Autobody).

It was absurd to think that Marianne would have waited around for two and half hours for our meeting to end in order to get me, but I wasn't thinking rationally. I insisted that Beth and I go the back way and cut through Glover's Lot, the sliding hill (where the Christian Ministry Center) to get to my house on South Main. It would be harder to walk across the snow covered hill but Beth knew I was scared so she agreed.

"She'll have forgotten about it by tomorrow," She tried to console me.

"Do you really think so?"
"Not really."

At least she was honest.
We came to a passageway between the Methodist Church and Ber-sheink's Grocery right where Main Street forked into South Main and Baltimore Avenue. I had to cross both streets and run up the hill to my house. I was afraid to step from the shadows onto the street for fear that Marianne would be there waiting for me.

"I'll go ahead and look and make sure the coast is clear," Beth said.

Beth went to the side walk and looked up and down Baltimore Avenue and called, "It's okay."

"No, go across the street to South Main and look all the way down the road to make sure she's not at the corner by the Armory," I whisper screamed from the shadows of the passageway.

"That's two blocks away! She can't see you from there," she hissed back.

"Maybe she can see my coat. Please!" I pleaded almost on the verge of tears.

She crossed the street and then gave me the high sign.

"I don't think you have to be that careful," she said when I darted up next to her.

"You're the one that said you didn't think she would forget," I reminded her.

We stood in silence for a while and she asked,

"Couldn't you get one of your brothers to beat her up?"

Beth knew I had older brothers but they were all married except for the one that was in Vietnam. He might consider doing something for me in his brash Marine way, but he wouldn't be available for anything except revenge, long after I had already been pounded. That left the other three. Would married brothers do something like that, I wondered.

"No," I said, "That would be like asking the police to beat her up."

Why had I run? It made me look guilty. That was the dumbest thing I could have done.

NOTES FROM THE DIRECTORS' DESKS

Sierra Ward, Executive Director, Lead Area Chamber of Commerce & Sanford Lab Homestake Visitor Center

Could we have imagined how different the world would be in just a few short weeks? The Visitor Center remains closed and we will follow the city's guidance on when to open public buildings. Unfortunately for the Visitor Center this also means it lacks any and all income sources, as it is funded exclusively through visitor donations and the gift shop.

In an effort to save money and reduce costs we have furloughed our staff on the Visitor Center side and the Chamber effective 4/25. Leigha will be off to focus on taking care of her kids and I will be going to half time. In essence it feels like we're going into hibernation, which is ironic because it's spring but less ironic because as I write this it's still snowing... We might be a little late to the furlough game but we need to try and save as much money as possible so we can continue to have both organizations well into the future.

While some continue to cancel and postpone events, I hope that we can all remain flexible. This situation has changed very quickly and seems to continue to develop daily. If we remain adaptable I am confident that when things begin to open up again we'll be ready to do business again! For this reason we are still waiting to postpone our Annual Banquet (5/21) until we get a bit closer to the date, as well as the 4th of July events and other summer fun. Stay tuned!

I'm missing seeing your smiles and I am looking forward to getting together again soon!

Leigha Patterson, Assistant Director, Sanford Lab Homestake Visitor Center & Lead Area Chamber of Commerce

May is a time for renewal. Does anyone out there feel renewed right now? I'm not sure that I do too much. With Covid-19 stretching on and on, it is hard to believe that Summer is really only a month and a half away! For me, self-quarantining has been busy with homeschooling, work, and making sure my toddler stays out of the trash can (her new exciting "toy"). On the nice days we get out and ride bikes and go for walks. The other day I almost planted seeds in our greenhouse. Luckily I didn't because then it snowed a foot and a half! Spring around here is such a tease. I love where I live, but eight months of snow is a little much and quarantining would be so much easier to bear if you were able to get outside everyday!

How are the rest of you all getting along? Finding new hobbies, binge watching tv, homeschooling, or any other way to get by? I'd love to hear what everyone has been up to. One way you can do this is by filling out and returning the Quarantine Bingo (posted in this newsletter). Upon return, you will be entered into a drawing for some fun prizes. Also, remember that we have extended the Tough Bucks until the end of May, so I encourage you to submit receipts to Sierra and I at the Chamber so you can receive your Tough Bucks and help stimulate the local economy!

On another note, the Visitor Center is, of course, closed until further notice, but that does not mean you cannot partake in the wonderful items from the gift shop or views of the open cut from the parking lot area. All items, including some of Black Hills Gold Jewelry, are available for purchase online, you can find this at <https://www.sanfordlabhomestake.com/shop/>. Many of these items would be perfect gifts for that person who is missing out on a fun birthday celebration or just anyone that is bored and needs a pick me up. And remember, purchases made through the Visitor Center website can also be counted towards the Tough Bucks rewards!

Hang in there everyone. This won't last forever, so in the meantime find things to make you smile, even if it is once a day! Questions, or comments email me at leigha@leadmethere.org

Doing the same events over and over, running the same programs you've always run, producing the same recruitment campaigns you've always produced, tracking the same metrics you've always tracked. Uncertain times give us the opportunity to reassess - WHY are we here? WHO do we serve? WHAT is actually working?

Synergy Solution Group operates as a peer network for the commercial HVAC industry. Yes, they've had adjustments to events and programs that needed to happen as a result of COVID-19, but their commitment to supporting members hasn't changed at all. They've understood the role that their organization plays in supporting business continuity and helping members help each other.

I'd love to hear which of these approaches YOUR organization is taking right now. Are you using primarily one of these - or more? It may even be a little bit of all four.

Founder & CEO of The Joy of Membership, Joy Duling has been working with leaders of associations, trade groups and nonprofits since 2005. She has also walked the same journey, serving for nearly 10 years as the Executive Director of a membership-based nonprofit which she helped launch from scratch and led to annual revenues of more than $1M exclusively from membership contributions. Find out more about her and her company at www.JoyofMembership.com You can email her at joy@joyofmembership.com

Preserve, Prune, Pivot & Power-Up: What Your Business Needs Now

Joy Duhling, Founder: Joy of Membership
[Abridged from Joy's weekly email newsletter.]

Like most of you, when closures and cancellations started to spread as a result of the COVID-19 situation, I experienced a moment of, "Uh oh, what does this mean?" I had to step back and remind myself that people need their communities and their industry advocates now more than ever before. I don't think I'm wrong in that assessment because

I've seen evidence of it every day among my clients and, hopefully, that is what you are seeing as well.

In my work with [my clients], we've explored 4 possible responses to their specific situations. Each has selected the option that they feel best reflects what members need from them right now and took action quickly.

1. PIVOT - The first possible response is a pivot. A pivot becomes necessary when you look at what your organization is doing and you realize, "This is NOT going to work at all," and you know that you absolutely must move in a different direction.

The founder of the Cochlear Implant Awareness Foundation (CIAF), one of my nonprofit clients, knew that a pivot was going to be critical as soon as Illinois' Governor ordered non-essential businesses to be closed in order to curtail the spread of the coronavirus. For the past several years, CIAF has been primarily funded through two upscale retail boutiques which would now be shuttered for an unknown period of time.

Over a single weekend, I assisted CIAF in switching from in-store sales to virtual options - personal shopping appointments and trunk shows conducted by Zoom. All of the appointments go through an online booking system which automatically creates a Zoom link and sends all of the necessary information to the customer. This pivot was essential to restoring revenue flow for the nonprofit, but it has also created an entirely new way of serving customers that will be able to continue even after the pandemic period passes.

2. POWER-UP - I call the second possible response a power-up. In this situation, an organization goes all-in on something that has already shown a glimmer of possibility.

The National Foundation for Danish America knew they were onto something after their launch at the start of 2020. Their email list began to rapidly grow, organizations that served the same audience reached out to partner, and new events were being added to their national event calendar every week. The pandemic period has given NFDA the unexpected opportunity to step into leadership in a bigger and more immediate way. They immediately "powered-up" their event calendar to become the singular source of disseminating information about event cancellations and changes. They also "powered-up" their partnerships with other organizations, including The Danish Pioneer, to help the traditionally print publication create a digital format which could be distributed to NFDA subscribers.

3. PRUNE - Pruning may feel like the most painful response for an organization. Being forced to cut back on staff or to cancel events that are long-standing traditions is never easy. These may feel like significant losses. But here's the thing about pruning... arborists prune back the branches of a tree to encourage future growth to be stronger, to improve the tree's health, to reshape the tree around obstacles, and to save trees that are damaged. Pruning presents an opportunity for growth. It's an opportunity to rethink and refocus the ways we do our work and deliver results for members.

The Affordable Assisted Living Coalition was forced to suspend the Annual Wii competition that the organization has hosted for more than a decade. Concern for the public health issues presented by teams gathering for the competition simply made it impossible for the competition to go on. While suspending the competition that had already begun was not an easy decision, AALC's leadership has doubled-down on communicating with and supporting members as they navigate through the current crisis and try to keep their residents safe.

4. PRESERVE

The final response to uncertain times like this is to preserve - as in preserving what's actually important. When times are good, it's actually easy to get stuck on auto-pilot:
